The Urban Development Support programme (Städtebauförderung) is a key feature for many German towns, cities and communities' forward-thinking and needs-oriented urban development processes aiming for holistic planning, decision-making and action triggered by dedication and creativity from local residents.

Under the umbrella of the National Urban Development Policy, the Urban Development Support programme has been one of the key instruments for delivering on the Leipzig Charter on Sustainable European Cities since 2007.

The money is provided in equal parts by the Federal Government, the federal states and the municipalities focusing on unprofitable duties of the public sector. The Federal Government and federal states agree on priority issues and on distribution, use and settlement of Urban Development Support funding. The federal states are responsible for distribution of fundings based on their urban development policies. Towns, cities and communities apply for fundings through the development of integrated urban development plans and retain ultimate planning sovereignty.

The programme pursues three aims through sub-programmes:

- Living Towns and Centres: Integrated measures for preservation and development of town and city cores;
- Social Cohesion: building coexistence in the neighbourhoods;
- Growth and Sustainable Regeneration: designing livable neighbourhoods.
